This research aims to determine: 1) the influence of content marketing on attitude toward advertisement, 2) the influence of influencer credibility on attitude toward advertisement, 3) the influence of content marketing on purchase intention, 4) the influence of influencer credibility on purchase intention, 5) the influence of attitude toward advertisement on purchase intention, 6) the influence of content marketing on purchase intention through attitude toward advertisement, 7) the influence of influencer credibility on purchase intention through attitude toward advertisement. The population of this research is students from the Faculty of Economics, Sanata Dharma University. This research uses purposive sampling method and data is obtained from the results of an online questionnaire distributed via Google Forms to 150 respondents. The analysis technique uses Partial Least Square with SmartPLS 4.0 software. The results of this research show that: 1) content marketing directly affects attitude toward advertisement. 2) influencer credibility directly influences attitude toward advertisement, 3) content marketing directly influences purchase intention, 4) influencer credibility does not directly influence purchase intention, 5) attitude toward advertisement influences purchase intention, 6) content marketing influences purchase intention through attitude toward advertisement, 7) influencer credibility influences purchase intention through attitude toward advertisement. Content marketing directly influences purchase intention, both directly and indirectly (complementary mediation). Influencer credibility cannot directly influence purchase intention, it requires a mediating variable attitude toward advertisement to influence purchase intention (indirect-only mediation).

Keywords: Content Marketing, Influencer Credibility, Attitude Toward Advertisement, Purchase Intention.
